STORY OF "THE LORD OF BURLEIGH."

The romance of real life is ordinary enough. It occurs every day, and then nobody thinks about it. A courting-match between a couple of rural lovers is full of this romance. But transfer it to higher society, and how lucid it gleams through, like a fine painting, with a judicious coat of varnish, bringing its hitherto concealed beauties into notice and admiration.

Henry Cecil, 10th Earl of Exeter, with landed estates to the yearly value of £100,000, and the palatial residence of Burleigh, with its statues, paintings, and articles of vertu, said to be worth £500,000, married a Miss Vernon, from whom, owing to her violation of the marriage vow, he was divorced in 1791. Almost heart-broken by this disgrace and misfortune, he resolved to retire from high life, and immediately after the divorce, he took himself to a retired village in Shropshire named Bolas, about 120 miles from his own beautiful Burleigh. Of that place, however, he was not long to remain, for the death of his uncle, the 9th Earl, in 1793. But he was heir-presumptive to the title and estates, and his pecuniary allowance was on a very ample scale, suited to his future position. At this time, too, he was only plain Mr. Henry Cecil.

At Bolas, he actually became a farm servant to a rough diamond, one Thomas Hoggins, who, besides his farm, had a mill in pretty full employ. Cecil's chief work was in this mill, and he labored like any other servant, fairly to earn his wages. Part of his business was to leave full bags of flour at various farm houses in the parish, and to take back to empty ones. He had frequently to call at the house of the local clergyman, the clergyman of Bolas, who according to the custom of the time and place, he was always invited to sit in the kitchen, and take "a mug of ale." He seldom was tempted to enter into conversation, but spoke so well, when he did converse, that Mr. Dickenson's household gave him the name of "Gentleman Harry." It was not long before this sobriquet, and its cause, became known to Mr. Dickenson, who put himself in the way of meeting this strange miller's man, and became so much interested in him that instead of being asked to rest and refresh in the kitchen, "Gentleman Harry" was regularly invited into the study, where the good pastor used to join him in a draught of home brewed and a pipe of the Nicotian weed.

One long, Mr. Dickenson, who had freely lent him various books, hinted his suspicion that "Gentleman Harry" belonged to a higher position than he then occupied. This was confessed, with an assurance that there was no disgrace connected with his situation, and a promise to reveal the particulars of the secret at no distant day.

Thomas Hoggins, the miller, had one daughter named Sarah, a kind and wide as the "Boson of Bolas." About this time she was scarcely twenty, and through the intervention of a moneyed aunt, had received what we have heard described (in her native Shropshire) as a "betterment education." That is, she read and wrote correctly, had some slight acquaintance with French, and played tolerably well upon the harpsichord. It came to pass Miss H. turned a favorable pair of bright blue eyes upon "Gentleman Harry." Alas, for the romance of the story, his premier journey was gone, and he was in his thirty eighth year. It happened also that he became interested in her, so much so that he called at the parsonage one evening to consult with Mr. Dickenson—in a word, to entreat him to marry them privately; and then, making a clean breast of it, "Gentleman Harry" confessed that he was Mr. Henry Cecil, next heir to the Earldom and estates of Exeter. He bound over the clergyman to secrecy, not allowing him to disclose his personal secret to Mr. Hoggins nor even to the fair Sarah. It was a difficult consent for the clergyman to oblige, but he consented to the marriage, which was celebrated on the 30th of October, 1791. The happy couple lived upon a small farm during the following two years—until Mr. Cecil casually learned from a Shropshire paper that the death of his uncle had placed a coronet upon his brow and immense wealth at his disposal.

Still concealing the secret of his rank from his wife, Cecil told her that he had determined upon a change of residence. She prepared to accompany him, leaving her happy Bolas with regret, for she had been happy there, as maid, wife, and mother. She accompanied her husband, and there came, at last, to Burleigh, the beauty of which greatly struck her, as they rode by it in their humble conveyance. Her husband told her that it was a show-place, and she gladly consented to his invitation to alight and see it. They entered the demesne, walked up the broad avenue with its double fringe of stately oaks, went through the garden and the conservatory, and finally made a visit to the mansion. At last, she was shown down the grand staircase, into the stately hall, around which ranged figures in antique armour, and family portraits, from the days of Holbein and Vandeyke down to Reynolds, her husband asked her how she liked the place. "Beautiful," she exclaimed. "Oh, Henry, what a Paradise to live and die in!" By this time a small crowd of relatives and attendants had made a circle about them. "Sarah," said he, as he kissed her white brow, "this place is yours. I am Earl of Exeter." Then turning to the company, he said, "This is the Countess of Exeter."

He himself, a Shropshire man, (Wem his birthplace, being near Bolas,) has told this story, and adds that the earl was too much for the peasant-countess. She fainted at the disclosure, and, he says, her mind never wholly recovered its balance.

Her children were a daughter, born at Bolas, in 1792, (whose daughter, added to Lord Charles Walpole, will probably be the Duchess of Wellington's heiress,) and two sons, the eldest of whom, born in 1795, is the present Marquis. The peasant-countess died in 1797, and her disconsolate husband married a third wife in 1800. He was elevated to a Marquisate in 1801, and died in 1804.

This is the real story of "The Lord of Burleigh," as narrated by Mr. Dickenson, of Bolas, as lately as 1851, when he died.—Phila. Press.

COAL!
